

Vertical Carbon Nanotube Field Effect Transistor

Abstract

A field effect transistor employs a vertically oriented carbon nanotube as the transistor body, the nanotube being formed by deposition within a vertical aperture, with an optional combination of several nanotubes in parallel to produced quantized current drive and an optional change in the chemical composition of the carbon material at the top or at the bottom to suppress short channel effects.